To Whom It May Concern,

I am writing to enthusiastically recommend Mohd Arshil, whom I had the pleasure of teaching English during his high school years at Lucknow Christian College. In my decades of teaching, few students have stood out like Arshil—for his imagination, voice, and the depth of his thought.

What impressed me most about Arshil was his storytelling and presentation skills. Whether reading aloud, delivering extempore speeches, or presenting essays, he consistently captivated both students and teachers alike. His writing has a unique rhythm—both emotional and intelligent—drawing readers into the heart of his message. He asked questions beyond textbooks: "Why do certain phrases stick with us emotionally?" or "How does language carry cultural meaning?"—questions that often deepened class discussions.

Arshil showed unwavering support to his peers, offering feedback on writing and helping many overcome fear of public speaking. Despite facing personal and financial constraints, he remained focused and consistently delivered high-quality work. Among a class of 45 students, Arshil emerged as one of the top communicators—not just in academic scoring, but in clarity, compassion, and engagement.

Beyond the classroom, he integrates his love for language with real-world impact. His environmental campaign, where he used biodegradable gliders with Tulsi seeds to teach 5th graders about nature and responsibility, reflects his desire to use communication for good.

Arshil has the kind of voice, both literally and figuratively, that belongs on a global platform. I believe he will be an asset to any institution that values empathy, cultural understanding, and leadership through expression.

Warm regards,

Best Wishes
